Liberia

ABOUT forty years before the American Civil War, a colony was established on the west coast of Africa as a home for freed American negroes by colonization societies who were interested in their repatriation.

Between 1822 and 1828, a number of such settlements were formed along the coast, south east of the British Colony of Sierra Leone. Several of these settlements called themselves Maryland, while the majority used the name Liberia which was invented from the word "liberty".

In 1847 the colonists declared themselves the Independent Republic of Liberia. Ten years later the Maryland group united with the Liberians as the Republic of Liberia was recognized by the leading nations.

The stamps of Liberia are an art gallery in themselves for most of them are printed in many colors and are sought by stamp collectors. From the designs of these stamps it is quite possible to get an idea of the different types of wild animals found in the country, its chief agricultural products, types of native dwellings, and in general a pictorial view of the geography and history of Liberia.

A DOG'S LIFE

DANNY shuffled along the sidewalk, his books dangling by a strap over his left shoulder, his eyes searching the ground. He glanced up for a second and saw Poodles, Carol's cocker spaniel, racing over the pavement, apparently headed directly for him. Quickly Danny jumped behind the nearest tree, waited breathlessly until the dog's footsteps had passed, then emerged somewhat sheepishly from his hiding place.

Unfortunately, Carol reached Danny's tree just at that second. "Hello, Danny," she said, looking at Danny strangely, almost as if she'd welcome an invitation to stop and chat for a few minutes.

But Danny just turned a beet red, mumbled his "hello", and hurried on. When he'd advanced a few steps, he furiously kicked a large stone out of his path and continued his shuffling pace.

"Danny! Wait up!" The shout reached Danny at the corner, and he turned to wait for his pal, Tommy. "I just saw Carol," Tommy bubbled as he caught up with Danny. "She looked kind of funny. Did you ask her to the dance yet"

"No," Danny said, "I didn't."

Tommy was surprised. "But, Danny," he asked, "why not? You must have met her, too. She was coming from this direction."

"Yes, I met her," Danny said resignedly. "But how could I talk to her? You saw her dog, didn't you?"

"Oh, yes," Tommy said sympathetically. "I forgot. But why don't you call her up? After all, she won't take Poodles to the dance which is only a week away. And it's the last one before school gets out. If you don't ask her now, you might not see her all summer."

"I know," Danny said, "and that isn't all. I'm broke."

"Why don't you get a job for after school and Saturday?" Tommy suggested. "You could earn enough in a week for the dance."

Danny shook his head. "I've just been trying that," he said discouragingly. "Nobody wants a part-time helper."

The two boys sighed mournfully. This was a problem! Danny continued to stare dejectedly at the ground, but Tommy refused to give in. He looked around for inspiration, as if he expected some idea to pop out of the air. Then his eyes lighted on a sign across the street, and he grabbed Danny's arm.

"Danny!" he cried. "Do you see what I see?"

Danny was startled for a minute, but he glanced quickly across the street and began hurrying forward again. "I see the 'Dogtown Kennels'," he said shakily, "and you know I always get past that place as quickly as possible."

"But, Danny," Tommy pleaded, "look at the sign beside the entrance."

Danny read it rapidly. "What if they do need a high school boy for one week?" he asked Tommy. "I wouldn't do them any good. They'd know right off how scared I am of dogs, and that would be that." Tommy was about to interrupt so Danny hurried on. "Besides," he added, "even if I weren't practically eaten up alive by these monsters at the end of the week, I'd be such a nervous wreck that I'd have to cancel my date with Carol!"

"Maybe the job's just in the office," Tommy suggested. "Maybe you wouldn't have anything to do with the dogs. At least, you could find out about it."

Danny stole a quick glance at the kennels, trembled visibly, and began walking away. Tommy caught up with him. "Well," he said, "if that's all you care about Carol, I guess you won't mind knowing that Ralph Adams is thinking of asking her to the dance."

Danny stopped dead in his tracks. "Did you say Ralph?" he asked incredulously. Tommy nodded. He hadn't wanted to tell Danny this news, but he knew how long Danny had been trying to get up enough courage to ask Carol for a date and how often Poodles had scared him away. And both of them knew what a dog enthusiast Ralph was. Why, if Ralph had one date with Carol, the two of them might even begin going steady, and that would be the end of Danny's dreams.

"All right," Danny said firmly, "I'll try." He girded himself with invisible armor and marched off toward the kennel entrance. Tommy waited for him outside.

About a half hour later Danny emerged, definitely the worse for wear. He waved weakly at Tommy, and the two of them continued on their way home.

"I have the job," Danny said, managing a wan smile. "It's mostly in the office, but I have to put water in all the kennels when the dogs are taken out for exercise."

"That's great!" Tommy exclaimed. "Then why the long face?"

"The owner insisted on taking me on a tour of all the kennels," Danny returned shakily. "If I live through this week . . ."

"You'll probably end up wanting a dog of your own," Tommy interrupted cheerfully while Danny glared at him.

The next week was a nightmare to Danny. Only the thought of his date with Carol Friday night pulled him through. Getting the date, Danny realized, had been the easiest part of the whole thing. He had phoned Carol the night he landed the job, and she had sounded really pleased that he'd asked her. By the time the phone call had ended, his ego had swelled one hundred per cent.

But the beating his ego took every day at the kennels was almost unbearable. He kept telling himself how silly it was for him, a high school junior, to be so frightened by a bunch of dogs, but still every time he heard one of them bark, he shuddered uncontrollably.

The day before the dance, after he finished his kennel duties, he met Carol coming out of the office.

"Hi, Danny," she smiled. "Didn't know you worked here."

"Well," Danny said slowly, "it's just sort of temporary. It ends tomorrow."

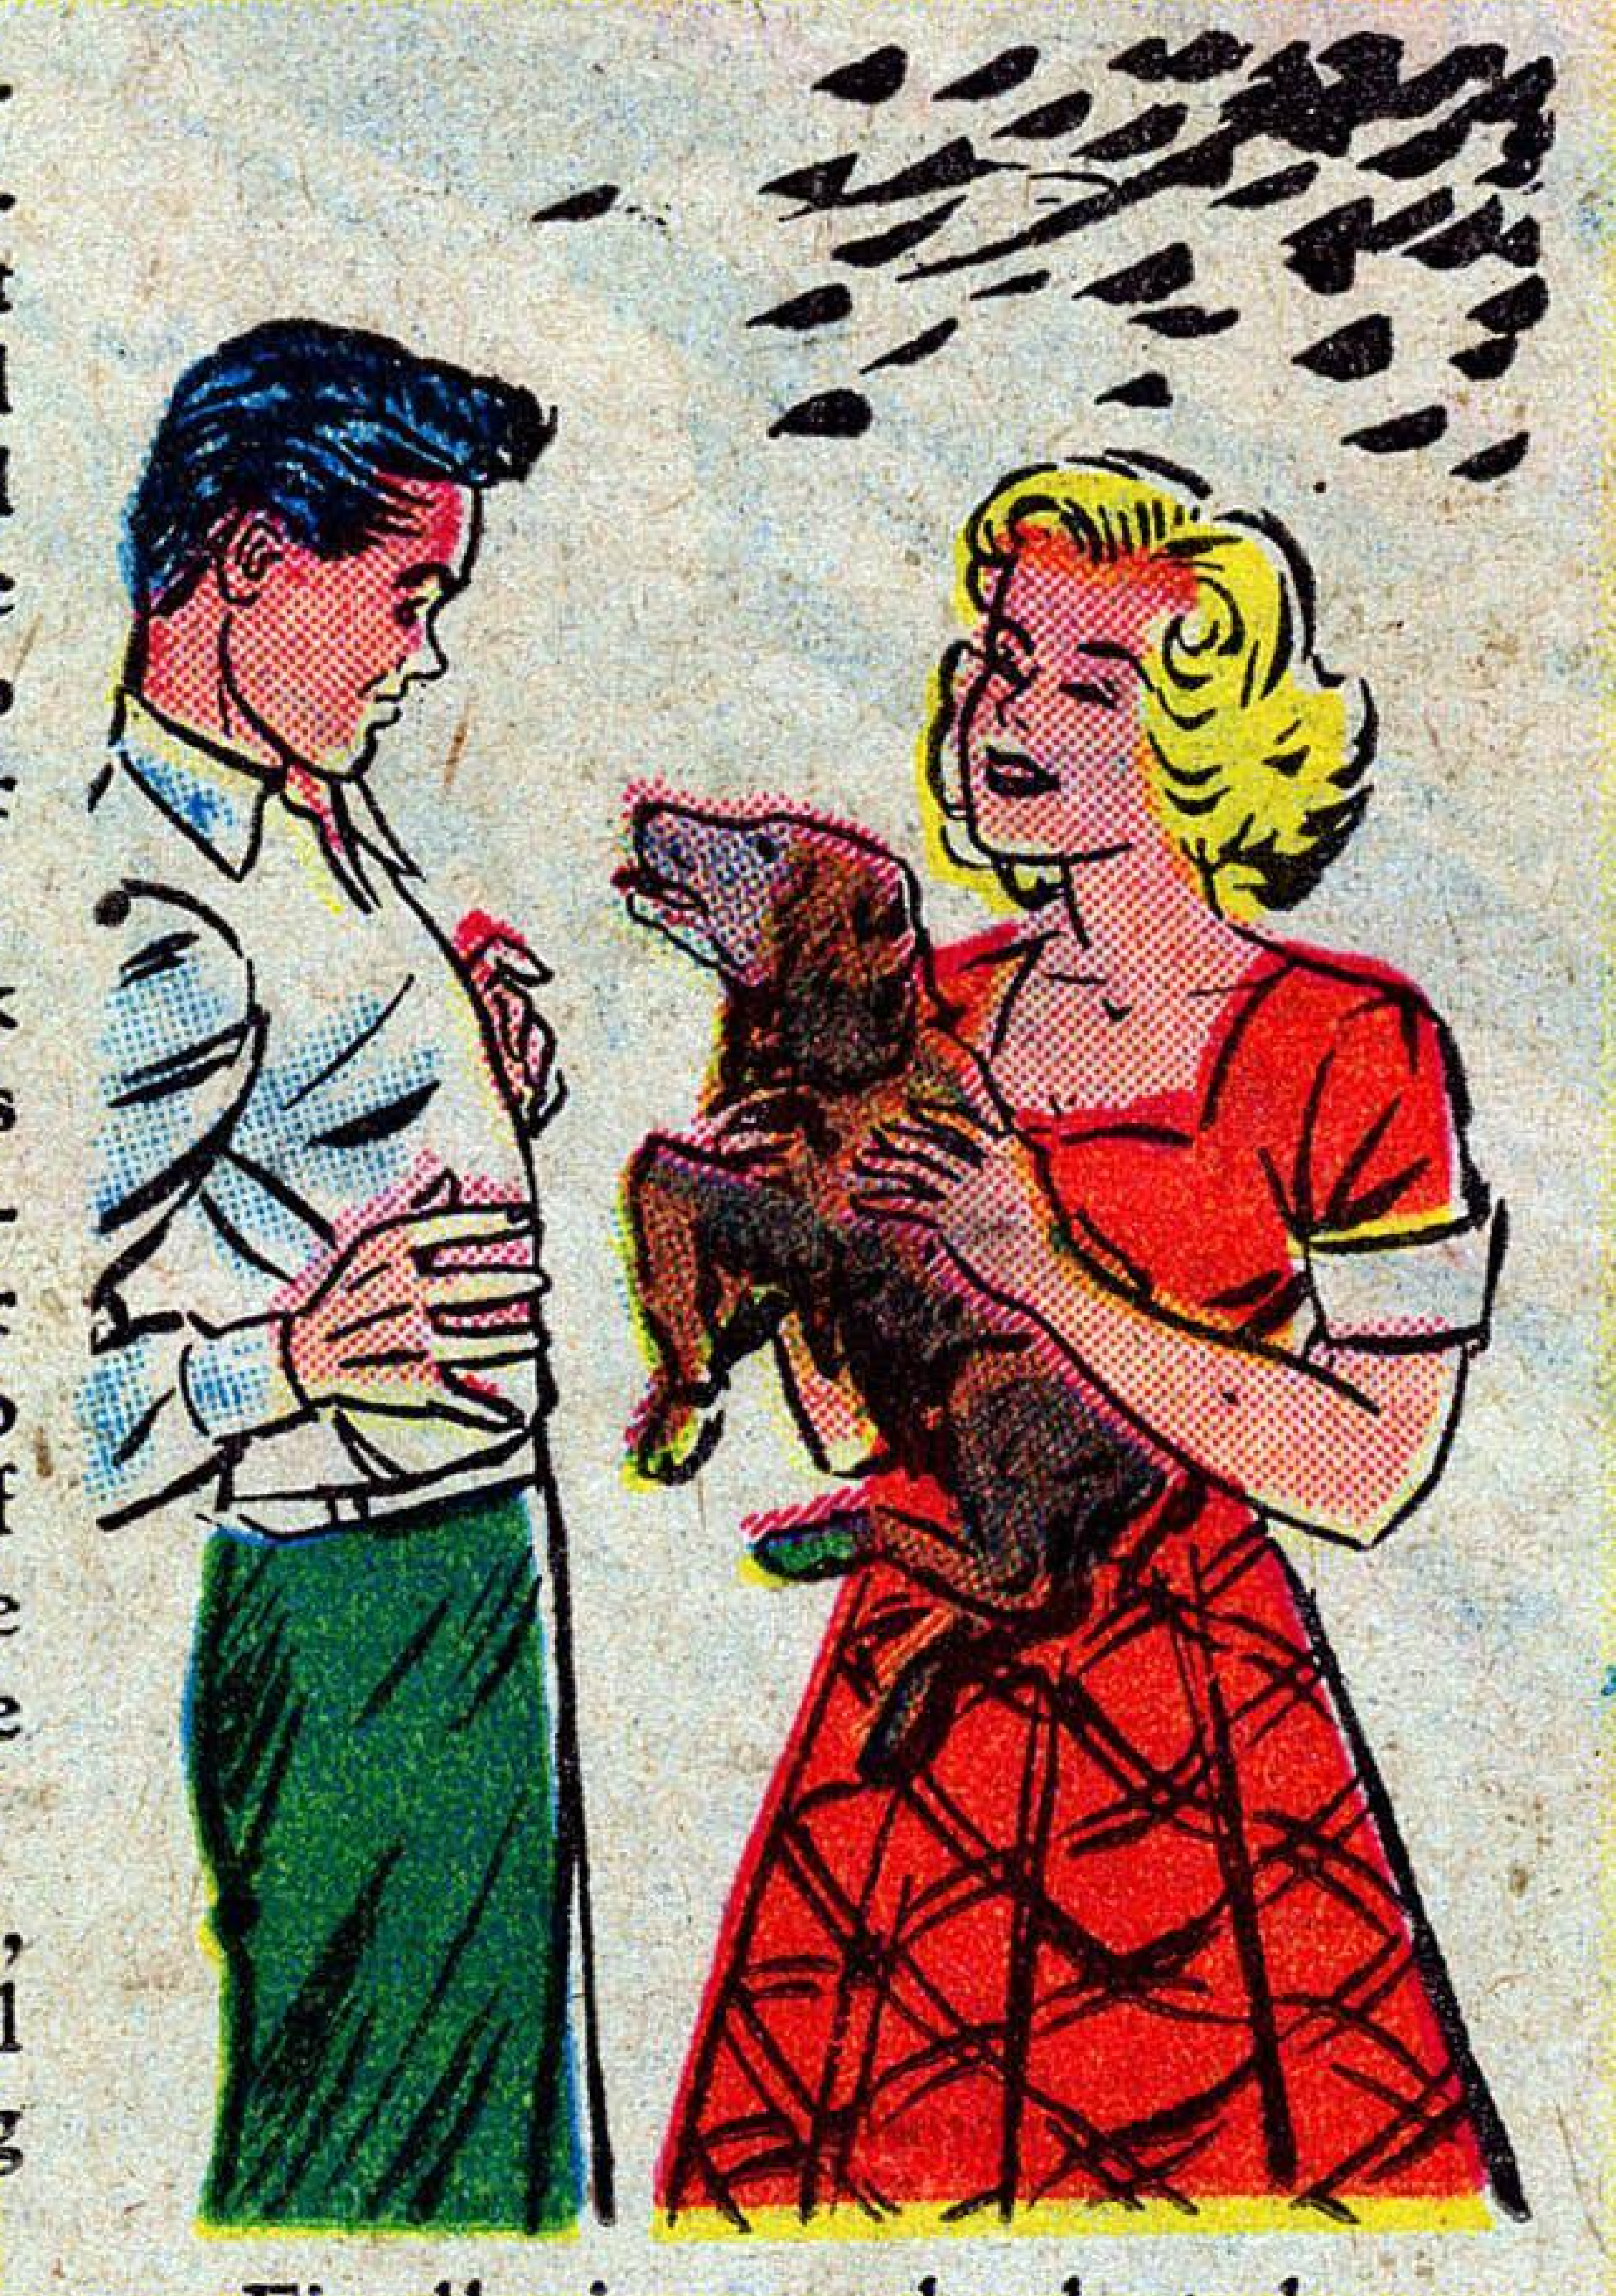
"I bet you've had a wonderful time while you've been here though," she said enviously. "What a terrific place to work for anyone who loves dogs!"

Danny was about to protest when a thought struck him. Why not pretend that he liked dogs? After all, he'd be through here tomorrow, and that would be the end of it. Don't forget Ralph Adams, he told himself.

"Yes," he said enthusiastically, "it is. It must be great to have a dog of your own."

Carol nodded. "You'll have to meet Poodles some time," she said, pleased. Then she was gone before Danny could think of a way to forestall meeting Poodles—and still preserve the impression he felt he'd made.

But the next night everything went beautifully. When he called for Carol, Poodles was kept in the kitchen to prevent the possibility of his mussing up her dress, so that was one worry off Danny's mind. As the dance progressed, Danny found that he was having a better time every minute, and Carol seemed to be enjoying herself just as much. Danny felt like kicking himself for not having asked her out before.



Finally it was the last dance. "Carol," Danny said softly, "would you be interested in a movie tomorrow night?"

"Oh, Danny," Carol answered, "I'd love it, but I'm going away for the week-end with my folks. As a matter of fact, I was going to ask you if you'd do me a favor."

Danny felt a warning bell ring inside him, but he said quickly, "Why, of course. What is it?"

"Well," Carol explained, "I was awfully glad when I saw you at the kennel because I had to leave Poodles there and I thought he wouldn't be so lonely if someone were there to give him a little extra attention. But when you told me you were finishing there today, I wondered if I might leave him at your house for the week-end."

Danny stopped dancing and led Carol to a chair at the side of the gym. He had to tell her now. There was no use pretending. He might have known it would come some time. The sooner, the better, he supposed. Keeping his eyes glued to his shoes, he told her that he was afraid of dogs, he'd always been afraid of them, and he'd never seemed very friendly to her whenever he saw her because she'd always been with Poodles. When he'd finished, he took a deep breath, looked up and saw Ralph approaching them.

"Guess Ralph is coming over to ask you to dance," he said resignedly.

"But this is our dance, isn't it?" Carol asked, standing up and smiling at him.

Dumfoundedly, Danny began to dance with her. He couldn't think of anything else to say. Finally Carol broke the silence. "I guess I've been pretty silly," she began.

"You!" Danny exclaimed.

"Yes, me," Carol said firmly. "All this time I thought you were trying to avoid me, and now you tell me it wasn't me at all. It was Poodles!"

"Oh," Danny gasped, "I've never wanted to avoid you!" Then he flushed a bright red.

Carol smiled. "Well," she suggested, "I used to be afraid of dogs, too—that is, until I got Poodles — so perhaps I could help you learn to like them."

Danny nodded. "I'd like that," he said.

"Then," Carol went on, "I'll leave Poodles at the kennel, but Monday perhaps you could come over for your first lesson on how to make friends with a dog."

Danny smiled down at Carol. He'd be there Monday. Somehow he didn't mind going to the dogs at all—as long as he was with Carol!
